When a man begins to caress and stimulate the clitoris, the tissues are usually dry. Thus, it will be very important that you realize that your woman will feel a slight irritation before the clitoris becomes moist, either through any lubricant you might use or through natural secretions. It stands to very good reason, therefore, that you should use no frictional stimulation at the beginning. You want to excite the clitoris, and an irritated clitoris is often almost impossible to really excite. Throughout your love-play, you will have to keep this in mind, but it is an especially important consideration at the very beginning of your caresses of the genital area. This is one reason why it is always best to take your time in building your woman's excitement before caressing the clitoris. If your woman is already very excited, the genital area will have already begun to lubricate itself; your first approach to the clitoris will help spread this natural lubricant up from the vagina to the object of your caresses.

In any case, it is best to begin your attentions to the clitoris gently and carefully. The skin of the clitoris is most sensitive, and your fingers must run smoothly over this part. So you can try four useful methods:

- 1 — You can roll your finger back and forth across the tip of the base of the clitoris in a rolling motion. But remember: this must be done lightly; and it is important that your hand be clean—not only for health reasons, but also because salt, acid, or dirt will irritate this highly sensitive love knob.
- 2 — Or, you can use a slightly vibrating stimulation. This is done by jiggling the finger over the clitoris without moving over any area (so to cause friction). In this way the surface moves with the finger as the skin stretches.
- 3 — You can use two fingers to stimulate the clitoris without chancing irritation. Gently place one finger on either side of the clitoris, forming a soft
